

On my own accord as a little boy I used to walk about a mile to the Baptist church that some of my extended family was a part of. My aunt taught Sunday school there. These were during the good days when a little kid could walk to church on Sundays in a good little southern country town where nothing ever went wrong. Oddly enough, every Sunday, I'd walk past a church with a big golden dome on it, but I didn't know anyone there and I was too intimidated to walk in. It was called St. Mary's.

All throughout my early youth I continued on with the Baptists, doing the little Christmas plays and learning about the usual Sunday school material.

Eventually we moved from that town and I started going to church with a different side of the family at a local Pentecostal assembly, still just up the street from where I live now. It wasn't really a church thing for me at that time, even as a little boy, even though I loved the activities and things with my family and friends then, I knew something was missing and frankly... shallow. I was done coloring pictures of Jonah and the whale and leaving the room when it was time for the grown people to hear their message... I never understood why the children were encouraged(sometimes forced) to leave the main area of the church when the real preaching was getting started. That's what I wanted to hear. I was thirsting for something substantial that I could never find, and it wasn't being filled by the redundant praise music and childish activities we were being spoon-fed.
